Overview of the Lecture

Gender equity is fundamental to effective and inclusive governance. This lecture will explore how ‘gender’ is understood, influenced, and shaped by global governance frameworks, norms, and institutions. Drawing on feminist and postcolonial perspectives, it will examine how major international institutions have incorporated—or failed to incorporate—gender considerations into their policies and structures.

The discussion will also address efforts to transform existing governance frameworks and consider how emerging global challenges, such as climate change and digital governance, are both shaping and being shaped by gendered power relations. Offering valuable insights for professionals in international relations, development, and policy-making, this lecture aims to foster a deeper understanding of creating more inclusive and effective global governance structures.

Dr Maryam Khalid

*Associate Dean Curriculum and Learning
Member of the Faculty of Arts Executive Leadership Team
Macquarie University*

Dr Maryam Khalid is the Associate Dean of Curriculum and Learning at the Faculty of Arts. She previously served as the Director of the Bachelor of International Studies. Maryam is dedicated to integrating research, higher degree research (HDR), and internationalisation into the curriculum. She actively builds strategic projects that bridge industry and academia.

Maryam’s research focuses on global governance, security, human rights, race, gender, and sexuality in global politics and international relations. She has published extensively on gender, race, militarism, violence, and popular culture. She is particularly interested in how identity is constructed and its impact in political, legal, and popular contexts.

Maryam’s current research projects include examining the failure of global governance and the liberal international system and exploring non-Western financial systems as alternative risk models, particularly in Islamic finance and Sharia-compliant banking.
